

Michael Ned Holte

Michael Ned Holte is a frequent contributor to Artforum. His writing has recently appeared in the exhibition catalogue Richard Hawkins—Third Mind (Art Institute of Chicago/Yale University Press, 2010) and the Web journal East of Borneo, for which he profiled legendary independent filmmaker Roger Corman. This past summer he was an artist-in-residence at the Headlands Center for the Arts, California, and he is currently visiting faculty at the California Institute of the Arts.

7

Haptic temptations Little irritates me more than the sight of people touching art, but several memorable solo shows in Los Angeles galleries this past year almost turned me into a hypocrite/ic. Shana Lutker's sculptures in wood, steel, rope, and leather (at Susanne Vielmetter Los Angeles Projects) simultaneously evoked letterforms, body parts, and instruments of torture. Rachel Foulon (at Ltd Los Angeles) called forth an agrarian history with structures of stained western red cedar and canvas colored with dye and Hawaiian sea salt. Emilie Halpern (at Pepin Moore) fluently incorporated ancient meteorites, a love-bird feather, and magician's flash paper. And Marie Jager (at François Ghebaly Gallery/Kunsthalle LA) summoned the elements by "painting" canvases with pollution and blasts of vehicular exhaust and treating blueprints of the city to the effects of sunlight and rain.